We understand that during the progress of a dance at the lower end of Presque Isle village on Saturday evening, quite a lively row took place, during which one of the parties was struck in the head with a brick, another was cut with a knife, and several shots were fired. The social season if opening briskly in that neighborhood, says the North Blusiness is lively in the yards of the N hood, says the North Star.

Business is lively in the yards of the N.
B. R. R. Co. at present, in Presque Isle, says the North Star. The old passenger station has been torn down and removed, and the new one is siready up and inclosed, and will be ready for occupancy in a few weeks. In the mean time a neat and convenient temporary office has been fitted up in the north end of the new freight house. With the new and enlarged buildings that are now finished the place is already much improved in appearance, and when the new passenger station is finished the railroad buildings here will be very creditable to the company, and a decided addition to the village architecturally.

The President and the Mugwumps. President Cleveland seems to have a faculty of placing his Mugwump admirers in most trying positions. For instance the New York Evening Post is opposing the candidacy of Col. Fellows for DistrictAttorney of New York and with excellent reason. Fellows is warmly indorsed by the boodlers and that with his former association with Tweed and his repudiated gumbling debts, etc., seems to stamp him as a most unfit man fer the position of public prosecutor. The Post well says of him:

In short, no party has ventured to propose him as public prosecutor, because they knew he could not be trusted to prosecute and because they knew he could always be hired at a small salary, and that his tastes and surroundings would slways queech his ambition.

There, is now an exciting canvass in progress in New York, one of the feature of which is an attempt to defeat this man for a position he is by the statement of the Post itself wholy unfit to occupy, and right at this critical stage of the proceedings President Cleveland writes a letter to the Democratic managers expressing his desire for the success of the ticket, and saying:

I know nothing which, if I were a voter in the city of New York, would prevent my support of Mr. Fellow's candidacy without the least misglvings as to his fitness and with considerable personal satisfaction.

The unequivocal declaration of "reformer" Cleveland that he should be pleased to vote for a man of Fellows! record is even more than the Post can stand. It has overlooked a great deal in Cleveland's course that has been entirely antagonistic to his professions of reform, at times being downright dishonest in its efforts to disguise the palpable fact that the President was making civil service reform a jest and by-word, but this last performance of the President in indorsing a man right in the teeth of the opposition made against his candidacy by obposition made against the candidaty by strength that the Post itself calls forth-a rebuke from that the that organ. It says:
We take leave to inform the President that his knowing of nothing

BY WILKIE COLLINS.

It was still early in the afternoon, but the light in the room was dim. The blinds were drawn down. Lady Montbarry sat with her back to the windows, as if even the subdued daylight were disagreeable to her. She had altered sadly for the werse in her personal appearance, since the memorable day when Dr. Wybrow had seen her in his consulting room. Her beauty was gone—her face had fallen away to more skin and bone the contrast between her ghastly complexion and her steely glittering black eyes was more starting than ever. Robed in dismal black, relieved only by the brilliant whiteness of her widow's cop—recilining in a panther like statting than ever. Mobed in dismai black, relieved only by this brilliant whiteness of her widow's cop—reclining in a panther like suppleness of attitude on a little green softensuppleness of attitude on a little green softensuppleness of attitude on a little green softensuppleness of attitude on a little green softensuppleness, which is momental languid curinsity, then dropped her gyes again to the hund screen which she held between her face and the fire. "I doo's know you," she said. "What do you want with me?"

Mrs. Ferrari tried to answer. Her first burst of courage had already worn itself out. The bold words she had determined to speak were living words still in her mind, but they died on her lips.

There was a moment of silence, Lady Montbarry locked round again at the speechless stranger. "Are you deaft" she asked. There was another purse. Lady Montbarry quietly locked back again at the screen, and put another question. "Do you want money?" "Money?" That one word roused the sinking spirit of the courier's wife. Bhe recovered ing spirit of the courier's wife. She recovered her courage; she found her vuice. "Look at me, my lady, if you please," she said, with a sudden outbreak of andacity. Lady Montbarry looked round for the third

Lady Montbarry looked round for the third time. The fatal words passed Mrs. Ferrari's lips.

"I come, my lady, to acknowledge the receipt of the money sent to Ferrari's widow."

Lady Montbarry's glittering black eyes rested with steady attention on the woman who had addressed her in those terms. Not the faintest expression of confusion or alarm, not even a momentary flutter of interest stirred the deadly stillness of her face. She reposed as quietly, she held the screen as composedly as even. The test had been tried, and had irretievably, utterly failed.

There was another silence. Lady Montbarry considered with herself. The smiles that came slowly and went away suddenly—thelsmild at once so sad and so cruel—showed itself on her thin lips. Beh lifted her screen, and pointed with it to a seat at the further end of the room. "He so good as to take that chair," she said.

Helpless upder her first bowildering sense of failure—not knowing what to say or what to do next—Mrs. Ferrari mechanically obeyed. Lady Montbarry, rising on the sofa for the first time, watched her with undisguited scrutiny as she crossed the room—then sunit back into a reclining position once more. "No," she said to horself quietly, "the woman walks steadily: she is not intoxicated—the only other possibility is that the may be mad." She had spoken loud enough to be heard. Stang by the insult, Mrs. Ferrari instantly answored her: "I am no more drunk or mad than you are!"

"I am no more drunk or mad than

"No?" said Lady Montbarry, "Then you are only insolent? The ignorant English mind ([have observed] is apt to be insolent in the exercise of unrestrained English that the control of the in the exercise of unrestrained English. This is very noticeable to us for oligners among you people in the streets. Of course I can't be insolent to you, in return. I hardly know wint to say to you. My maid is imprudent in admitting you so easily to my room. I suppose your respectable appearance misled her. I wouler who you are? You mentioned the name of a courier who left us very strangely. Was he married, by any chance? Are you his wife? And do you know where he is!?

Are you his wife? And do you know where he is?

Mrs. Perrari's indignation burst its way through al! restraints. She advanced to the sofa; she feared nothing, in the fervor and rage of her reply.

"I am his wiftow—and you know it, you wicked woman! Ah! it was an evil hour when Miss Lockwood recommended my husband to be his lordship's courier"—

Before Mrs. Ferrari could add another word Lady Montharty sprung from the sofa with the stealthy suddenness of a cat—seized her by hoth soldiers—and shook her with the strength and friency of a mad woman. "You lie! you lie! you lie!" She dropped her hold at the third repetition of the accusation and threw up her hands wildly with a gestire of despair. "Oh, Jesus Mariaji is ! possible?" she cried. "Can the courier have come to me threw up her hands wildly with a gestire of despair. "Oh, Jesus Marial is it possible?" she cried. "Can the courier have come to me through that woman?" She turned like lightning on Mrs. Ferrari, and stopped her as she was escaping from the room. "Stay here, you fool—stay here and answer me! if you cry out, as sure as the heavens are above you, I'll strangle you with my own hands. Slit down again—and fear nothing. Wretch! It is I who am frightened—frightened out of my senses. Confess that you lied when you used Miss Lockwood's name just how! No! I don't believe you, on your eath! I will believe nobody but Miss Lockwood hersell. Where does she live! I'tell me that, you nox-lous, stinging little insect—and you may go." Terrified as she was, Mrs. Ferrari bestated. Lady Montharry littled her hands threateningly, with the long, lean, yellow—white fingers outspread and crooked at the tips. Mrs. Ferrari shrunk at the sight of them, and gave the ardress. Lady Montharry pointed contemprousity to the door—then changed her m.nd. "No! not yet! you will tell Miss Lockwood what has happened, and she may refuse to see me. I will go there at once, and you shall go with me. As far as the house—no; igside of it. Sit down again. I am going to ring for my mid. Tirm your back to the deor; your cowardly face is not fit to be seen!"

She rang the bell. The maid appeared. "My clock and bomet—instantiv!"

Bis rang the beil. The maid speeared.

"My closk and bonnet—instantly!"
The midd produced the closk and bonnet from the bedroom.

"A cab at the door—before I can count ten!"

"A cah at the door—before I can count ten!"

The maid vanished. Lady Montharry surveyed herself in the glass, and wheeled round again, with her cat like suddenness, to Mrs. Forrari.

"I look more than half dead already, don't I'p' she said, with a grim burst of irony. "Give me your arm."

She took Mrs. Ferrari's arm and left the room. "You have nothing to fear, so long as you obey," she whispered, on the way down stairs. "You leave met hy the landlady of or and never see me again."

In the half they were met by the landlady of the hotel. Lady Montharry graciously presented her companion. "My good friend, Mrs. Ferrari," ans og lad to have seen her." The landlady accompanied them to the door. The cab was waiting. "Get in first, good Mrs. Ferrari," said her ladyship, "and tell the man where to go."

They were driven away. Lady Montharry's variable humor changed again. With a low grean of misry, she threw herself back in the cab. Lost in her own dark thoughte, as cardess of the woman whom she had bent to her iron. Will, as if ne such person as to by her side, she preserved a sinister effect, and the losse of the cab. I had no she where Miss Lockwood lodged. In an instant, she roused herself to action. She opened the door of the cab, sind closed it again on Mrs. Ferrari before the driver could get off his box.

"Take tast lady a mile further on her way haven?"

Ferrari Denote that hady a mile further on her way home? she said, as sin paid the man his fare. The next instant she had knocked at the house door. "Is Miss Lookwood at home?" "Yes, maken".
